Tips for Healthcare Professionals¹

Some of your patients have young caregivers in their families. Young carers are often involved with aspects of a family member's care and can be affected by the situation in many ways themselves.

CONSIDER THE FOLLOWING:

-  Acknowledge the young person with a simple, "Hi".
-  Identify young carers by asking patients about their caregivers, or ask appropriately when youth are present.
-  Ask young carers, "How are you today?" Or, "Do you need help with anything?" Be sincere because it is not the words you choose but the caring behind them.
-  Be honest and transparent with young carers when they ask questions about their family member's health, care plan, and other needs.
-  Provide information that is age appropriate so that young carers can understand what is going on and how to properly care for their family member if they need to. Provide information about what to expect in the short- and long-term, including future care needs if applicable.
-  Develop a crisis plan with the young carer for an emergency situation, including people who can be called any time of day or night.
-  Provide young carers with information about relevant community support.
-  Don't underestimate the impact you're having as a caring adult.
